Old people often have deficiencies in important nutrients, such as zinc. Supplementation may not overcome these because of physiological changes associated with age rather than mere availability of zinc in the diet. This study examined levels of a zinc transporting protein called metallocthionein (MT) and found that these decrease in old age independently of dietary zinc intake. This finding may contribute to understanding age-associated zinc deficiency.